

Mixed Metaphors

Mixed Metaphors:
The Danse Macabre in Medieval and Early Modern Europe

Edited by

Sophie Oosterwijk and Stefanie Knöll

CAMBRIDGE SCHOLARS

P U B L I S H I N G

Mixed Metaphors:
The Danse Macabre in Medieval and Early Modern Europe,
Edited by Sophie Oosterwijk and Stefanie Knöll

This book first published 2011

Cambridge Scholars Publishing

12 Back Chapman Street, Newcastle upon Tyne, NE6 2XX, UK

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Copyright © 2011 by Sophie Oosterwijk and Stefanie Knöll and contributors

All rights for this book reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

ISBN (10): 1-4438-2900-5, ISBN (13): 978-1-4438-2900-7

CONTENTS

List of Illustrations	ix
Preface	xxi
Hartmut Freytag
Introduction	1
Sophie Oosterwijk and Stefanie Knöll
Duality and Allegory
Dance, Dialogue and Duality: Fatal Encounters in the Medieval Danse Macabre	9
Sophie Oosterwijk
Dances of the Living and the Dead: A Study of Danse Macabre Imagery within the Context of Late-Medieval Dance Culture.....	43
Frances Eustace with Pamela King
Dance, Music, and Inversion: The Reversal of the Natural Order in the Medieval Danse Macabre	73
Susanne Warda
From Allegory to Anatomy: Femininity and the Danse Macabre	101
Maike Christadler
Macabre Parallels
Dialogue and Violence in Medieval Illuminations of the Three Living and the Three Dead.....	133
Christine Kralik
Mixed Encounters: The Three Living and the Three Dead in Italian Art...	155
Marco Piccat

Death Personified in Medieval Imagery: The Motif of Death Riding a Bovine	169
Sylvie Bethmont-Gallerand

Death in Drama and Literature

Romance Macabre : Middle English Narrative and the Dead in the Codex.....	191
Kenneth Rooney

Frightened or Fearless: Different Ways of Facing Death in the Sixteenth- Century Majorcan Play Representació de la Mort	207
Lenke Kovács

The Kiss of Death: Death as a Lover in Early Modern English Literature and Art	237
Jean Wilson

Spatial Contexts

Places for Reflection: Death Imagery in Medieval Choir Stalls	269
Kristiane Lemé-Hébuterne

The Istrian Danse Macabre : Beram and Hrastovlje	291
Tomislav Vignjević

The Danse Macabre at Bierdzany-Bierdzańska Śmierć (Poland)	311
Jutta Schuchard

The Macabre in Print

A Phenomenon of Parallel Reading in the Office of the Dead	325
Caroline Zöhl

Letters without Words? The Danse Macabre Initials by Hans Holbein and his Followers.....	361
Winfried Schwab

Mix and Match: Huldreich Fröhlich's Danse Macabre Editions	385
Stefanie Knöll

Bibliography	407
Contributors	441
Index	443

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Text figures (b&w)

Sophie Oosterwijk

1. 'Imago mortis', woodcut by Michael Wolgemut in Hartmann Schedel's Liber Chronicarum (Nuremberg Chronicle) published by Anton Koberger in 1493. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
2. Death and the Nun, woodcut by Hans Holbein the Younger in Les simulachres & historiees faces de la mort published in 1538.
3. Incised tomb slab of an unmarried girl named Ingeborch (d. 1429) from the Franciscan friary in Nyköping, now in the Nyköpingshus Museum (Sweden). Photo: F.A. Greenhill Collection.
4. Death playing the shawm at the start of Bernt Notke's 1463 Danse Macabre formerly in the Marienkirche, Lübeck. Lithograph after Robert Geissler (1872). © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
5. Four musical corpses, additional woodcut in the expanded Danse Macabre edition published by Guy Marchant in 1486.
6. Woodcut at the start of the Débat du corps et de l'âme in the expanded Danse Macabre edition published by Guy Marchant in 1486.
- 7a-b. Brass of John Rudyng, Archdeacon of Lincoln (d. 1481), with a detail of Death, at Biggleswade (Bedfordshire). Rubbing and photo: Martin Stuchfield.
8. Brass of the park-keeper James Gray (d. 1591), Hunsdon (Hertfordshire). Rubbing: Martin Stuchfield.
9. Death and the Knight, woodcut by Hans Holbein the Younger in Les simulachres & historiees faces de la mort published in 1538.
10. Wheel of Life, or Rota vitae alias fortunae, with seven Ages, woodcut, Middle-Rhine area, c.1480 (London, British Library, IC.35). © The British Library.
11. The faces of the two effigies on the double-decker tomb of Alice de la Pole, duchess of Suffolk (d. 1475), Ewelme (Oxfordshire). Photos: C.B. Newham.

12. Death and the Emperor, woodcut by Hans Holbein the Younger in Les simulachres & historiees faces de la mort published in 1538.
13. Emperor Maximilian I (d. 1519), woodcut portrait by Albrecht Dürer, 1518.
14. ‘Vng roy mort’ (a dead King) and the Author, final woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
15. Portrait of John Isham (1567), by an anonymous artist, oil on panel, Lampport Hall (Northamptonshire). © The Lampport Hall Trust.

Frances Eustace with Pamela M. King

16. The Cardinal and the King, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
17. The Friar and the Child, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
18. The Parson and the Labourer, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
19. The Archbishop and the Knight, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
20. The Clerk and the Hermit, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
21. The Bishop and the Squire, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
22. The Monk, the Usurer and the Poor Man, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
23. The Lawyer and the Minstrel, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.
24. The Astronomer and the Burgher, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s Danse Macabre edition first published in 1485.

Susanne Warda

25. ‘Dantz hus’ scene with musical and dancing corpses, opening woodcut in Der doten dantz mit figuren clage und antwort schon von allen staten der werlt attributed to the printer Heinrich Knoblochzer, after 1485.
26. The Abbot and the Canon in the Bern Danse Macabre mural by Niklaus Manuel, 1516-19/20, lithograph from Joseph Bergmann, Niklaus Manuels Todtentanz... (Bern, c.1823). © Graphiksammlung ‘Mensch und Tod’, Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
27. Death and the hantwercksman (Craftsman), woodcut in Der doten dantz ... attributed to Heinrich Knoblochzer, after 1485.

28. Death and the Pope, engraving by Matthäus Merian the Elder based on the Großbasel Danse Macabre mural of c.1440, published in 1649.
29. Death and the Waldbruder (Hermit), engraving by Matthäus Merian the Elder based on the Großbasel Danse Macabre mural of c.1440, published in 1649.
30. Death and the Queen, engraving by Matthäus Merian the Elder based on the Großbasel Danse Macabre mural of c.1440, published in 1649.
31. Death and the Cripple, engraving by Matthäus Merian the Elder based on the Großbasel Danse Macabre mural of c.1440, published in 1649.
32. The Widow and the Maiden in the Bern Danse Macabre mural by Niklaus Manuel, 1516-19/20. Lithograph from Joseph Bergmann, Niklaus Manuels Todtentanz... (Bern, c.1823). © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.

Maike Christadler

33. The Monk and the Abbess in the Bern Danse Macabre mural by Niklaus Manuel, 1516-19/20, lithograph from Joseph Bergmann, Niklaus Manuels Todtentanz... (Bern, c.1823). © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
34. Monogrammist M, Death and the Maiden, engraving, first half of the sixteenth century. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
35. George Grosz, The Artist in his Studio, photograph, c.1918. © Grosz-Archiv, Akademie der Künste, Berlin.
36. Hans Sebald Beham, Death with Three Women, engraving, c.1540. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
37. Hans Sebald Beham, Death and the Sleeping Woman, engraving, 1548. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
38. Niklaus Manuel, Death as a Mercenary with a Maiden, drawing on panel, 1517. © Kunstmuseum Basel, Inv. Nr. 419. Photo: Martin P. Bühler.
39. Niklaus Manuel, Bathseba at her Toilette, drawing on panel (reverse of Fig. 38), 1517. © Kunstmuseum Basel, Inv. Nr. 419. Photo: Martin P. Bühler.
40. Albrecht Dürer, Blazon of Death, engraving, 1503. © Kunstmuseum Basel, Inv. Aus K.10.147. Photo: Martin P. Bühler.

41. ‘Von buolschafft’ (On Courtship), woodcut from Sebastian Brant’s Ship of Fools published in Basel, 1499. © Universitätsbibliothek Basel, DA III 4a:2.
- 42a-b. Matthäus Greuter, Omnis Caro Foenum et Gloria Sicut Flos Agri, with and without lifted skirt, engraving, 1596. © Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin – Preußischer Kulturbesitz - Handschriftenabteilung: YA 2840 kl.
43. Title page of Andreas Vesalius’ De humani corporis fabrica published in Basel, 1543, engraving. © Universitätsbibliothek Basel, Lb I 1.
44. Flowering foetus, engraving from Adrianus Spigelius’ De humani corporis fabrica libri decem published in Frankfurt, 1632. © Universitätsbibliothek Basel, Lb III 6:1.

Christine Kralik

45. The Three Living and the Three Dead, miniature in the De Lisle Hours (New York, Pierpont Morgan Library, MS G.50, fol 6v), c.1320-25. © The Pierpont Morgan Library, New York.
46. Master of the Munich Boccaccio, The Three Living and the Three Dead, miniature in the Hours of Anne de Beaujeu (Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, NAL 3187, fol. 139v), c.1470. © Bibliothèque nationale de France.
- 47a. The Ghent Associates, The Three Living and the Three Dead, miniature in the Berlin Hours of Mary of Burgundy and Maximilian I (Berlin, Kupferstichkabinett-SMPK, 78 B 12, fol. 220v), c.1480. Photo: Joerg P. Anders. © Bildarchiv Preußischer Kulturbesitz / Art Resource, NY.
- 47b. The Ghent Associates, Corpse with a spear and a coffin, miniature in the Berlin Hours of Mary of Burgundy and Maximilian I (Berlin, Kupferstichkabinett-SMPK, 78 B 12, fol. 221r), c.1480. Photo: Joerg P. Anders. © Bildarchiv Preußischer Kulturbesitz / Art Resource, NY.
48. The Master of the Dresden Prayerbook, The Three Living and the Three Dead, miniature in a Flemish book of hours (Berlin, KK-SMPK, 78 B 14, fol. 277v), c.1480. © Bildarchiv Preußischer Kulturbesitz / Art Resource, NY.

Marco Piccat

49. The Legend of the Three Living and the Three Dead, woodcut in Guy Marchant’s expanded Danse Macabre edition of 1486.

- 50a-b. Encounter between death and a group of pilgrims from all walks of life, sometimes described as a 'predica della morte' (Sermon of Death) or 'predica dei morti' (Sermon of the Dead), fifteenth-century fresco in the abbey of San Michele della Chiusa, Turin. Photo: author.

Sylvie Bethmont-Gallerand

51. Albrecht Dürer, The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, woodcut, 1498. © The British Library.
52. A blindfolded figure of Death on a cow pursuing a young horseman, marginal decoration in the Amiens Missal (The Hague, Royal Library, KB MS 78 D 40, fol. 154v), 1323. © The Hague, Royal Library.
53. Death riding a bovine, misericord in the church of Saint-Adrien, Pocé-sur-Cisse (Indre-et-Loire), late fifteenth century. Photo: author.
54. Death riding a crocodile, emblem from Proteus by the Dutch poet Jacob Cats published in 1618. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.

Kenneth Rooney

55. Simon Bening and workshop (Southern Netherlands), Raising of Lazarus, miniature at the start of the Office of the Dead in the book of hours of Joanna of Ghisteltes (Use of Messines), early sixteenth century (London, British Library, Egerton MS 2125, fol. 64v). © The British Library.

Lenke Kovács

56. Danse Macabre mural in the former Franciscan convent of Morella in the province of Castellón (Spain), c.1470. Photo: author.
57. Costumed dancers in a Maundy Thursday procession in Verges (Spain). Photo: author.

Jean Wilson

58. Monument to John Latch and his wife Sarah (both d. 1644), Churchill (Somerset). Photo: Norman Hammond.
- 59a-b. Details of the monument to John Latch and his wife Sarah (both d. 1644), Churchill (Somerset). Photo: Norman Hammond.

60. Brass to Joan Strode (d. 1649) at Shepton Mallet (Somerset). Rubbing: Martin Stuchfield.
61. Boetius Bolswert, engraving after David Vinckboons, Unequal Lovers and Death, early seventeenth century. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
62. Eighteenth-century tombstone showing a young girl holding a maiden-garland and being accompanied by Death as a skeleton, Falstone (Northumberland). Photo: Norman Hammond.
63. Detail of the eighteenth-century tombstone to a young girl at Falstone (Northumberland). Photo: Norman Hammond.
64. Tombstone of Deborah Devanport (d. 1774), Little Compton (Rhode Island, USA). Photo: Norman Hammond.
65. Tombstone of Lovis Devanport (d. 1774), Little Compton (Rhode Island, USA). Photo: Norman Hammond.

Kristiane Lemé-Hébuterne

66. Arm-rest with Death in the abbey church of La Trinité, Vendôme (Loir-et-Cher, France), late fifteenth century. Photo: author.
67. Misericord with Death and foliage, Remy church (Oise, France), sixteenth century. Photo: author.
68. Arm-rest with Death and scythe, Saint-Martin-aux-Bois (Oise, France), very end of the fifteenth century. Photo: author.
69. Misericord with Death and young lady, Chaumont-en-Vexin (Oise, France), 1507-15. Photo: author.
70. Arm-rest showing a lady with hourglass and skull, collegiate church of Sainte-Catherine, Hoogstraten (Belgium), c.1525. Photo: author.
71. Misericord showing a putto leaning on a skull on top of a coffin, church of Saint-Gervais-Saint-Protais, Paris, c.1540. Photo: author.
72. Misericord showing a reclining putto with hourglass and skull, Grote Kerk, Dordrecht (Netherlands), 1538-41. Photo: author.
- 73a. Pendentive showing a young lady with a mirror, Amiens Cathedral (Somme, France), 1508-19. Photo: author.
- 73b. Pendentive showing a young man with a skull, Amiens Cathedral (Somme, France), 1508-19. Photo: author.
74. Misericord with Death looking at himself in a mirror, Orbais (Marne, France), c.1520-25. Photo: author.
75. Parclose with a jester and bauble, collegiate church of Sainte-Catherine, Hoogstraten (Belgium), c.1525. Photo: author.

Tomislav Vignjević

76. Vincent of Kastav, Danse Macabre fresco on the west wall in the church of St Mary, Beram (Istria), 1474. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
77. The Merchant and Knight in the Danse Macabre fresco at Beram (Istria), 1474. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
78. The Knight, woodcut in the Heidelberg Blockbook, c.1458 (Heidelberg, Universitätsbibliothek, Cod. Pal. germ. 438). © Universitätsbibliothek Heidelberg.
79. The Beggar in the Danse Macabre fresco at Beram (Istria), 1474. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
80. The Beggar, woodcut in the Heidelberg Blockbook, c.1458 (Heidelberg, Universitätsbibliothek, Cod. Pal. germ. 438). © Universitätsbibliothek Heidelberg.
81. Master with the Banderoles, The Wheel of Fortune and the Tree of Estates, engraving, 1464. © Vienna, Graphische Sammlung Albertina.
82. Danse Macabre, Venetian woodcut, c.1500. © Bremen, Kunsthalle.
83. The Physician in the Danse Macabre fresco at Hrastovlje (Istria), 1490. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
84. The King, Queen and Cardinal in the Danse Macabre fresco at Hrastovlje (Istria), 1490. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
85. The Child in the Danse Macabre fresco at Hrastovlje (Istria), 1490. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
86. The Child, woodcut in the Heidelberg Blockbook, c.1458 (Heidelberg, Universitätsbibliothek, Cod. Pal. germ. 438). © Universitätsbibliothek Heidelberg.

Jutta Schuchard

87. The Danse Macabre scene in the Catholic parish church of St Hedwig in Bierdzan (Bierdzany) near Opole (Oppeln) in Silesia (Poland). Photo: author.
88. Ground plan of the church of St Hedwig in Bierdzan (Poland). Sammlung Nietsch, 1936/38. © Herder-Institut Marburg, Bildarchiv. Image No. 249576.
89. Title page of Matthäus Merian the Elder's Todten-Tantz wie derselbe in der löblichen und weitberühmten Stadt Basel ... zu sehen ist, c.1725. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.

Caroline Zöhl

90. The Three Living and the Three Dead, metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibermühle, Heribert Tenschert.
91. The Three Living and the Three Dead. anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Dominican Use) published by Yolande Bonhomme, Paris, 1542. © Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin.
92. Expulsion from Paradise: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Dominican Use) published by Yolande Bonhomme, Paris, 1542. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibermühle, Heribert Tenschert / Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin.
93. Adam and Eve in the world and Cain slaying Abel: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Thielman Kerver, Paris, 5 December 1519. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibermühle, Heribert Tenschert.
94. Adam praying to God: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Thielman Kerver, Paris, 24 November 1520. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibermühle, Heribert Tenschert / Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin.
95. The funeral mass of Raymond Diocrès: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Yolande Bonhomme, Paris, 5 December 1519. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibermühle, Heribert Tenschert.
96. Birth, Death and Old Age: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Dominican Use) published by Thielman Kerver, Paris, 24 November 1520. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibermühle, Heribert Tenschert / Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin.

97. Souls in Purgatory: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Dominican Use) published by Yolande Bonhomme, Paris, 1542. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibernmühle, Heribert Tenschert / Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin.
98. Deathbed – Ars moriendi: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Dominican use) published by Yolande Bonhomme, Paris, 1542. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibernmühle, Heribert Tenschert / Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin.
99. Job on the Dung heap: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Dominican use) published by Yolande Bonhomme, Paris, 1542. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibernmühle, Heribert Tenschert / Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin.
100. The Three Enemies of Man: World, Flesh and the Devil: (left) metalcut by Jean Pichore in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Jean Barbier and Guillaume Le Rouge, Paris, 22 August 1509, and (right) anonymous metalcut in a book of hours (Use of Rome) published by Thielman Kerver, Paris, 10 September 1522. © Ramsen, Antiquariat Bibernmühle, Heribert Tenschert.

Winfried Schwab

101. Hans Holbein the Younger, Alphabet of Death, woodcuts, c.1523.
102. Johann Quentel, The Pope (H), woodcut, Cologne, c.1550.
103. Johann Quentel, The Knight (N), woodcut, Cologne, c.1550.
104. Johann Quentel, Hunting Scene (O), woodcut, Cologne, c.1550.
105. Johann Quentel, The Pope and the King Playing Cards (L), woodcut, Cologne, c.1550.
106. Johann Quentel, Robbery (M), woodcut, Cologne, c.1550.
107. Johann Quentel, Three Elegantly Dressed People (F), woodcut, c.1550.
108. Johann Quentel, Nobleman and Noblewoman (I), woodcut, c.1550.
109. Johann Quentel, The Cardinal (T), woodcut, Cologne, c.1550.

Stefanie Knöll

110. Death and the Senator, woodcut and text from Huldreich Frölich's 1608 edition. © Herzog August Bibliothek Wolfenbüttel (67 Poet.).
111. Death and the Abbot, woodcut from Huldreich Frölich's 1608 edition, with the monogram of the master 'HW' below the Abbot's right elbow. © Herzog August Bibliothek Wolfenbüttel (67 Poet.).
112. Death and the Pope, woodcut from Huldreich Frölich's 1608 edition. © Herzog August Bibliothek Wolfenbüttel (67 Poet.).
113. Death and the Blind Man, woodcut from Huldreich Frölich's 1608 edition. © Herzog August Bibliothek Wolfenbüttel (67 Poet.).
114. Death and the Young Man, woodcut from Huldreich Frölich's 1608 edition. © Herzog August Bibliothek Wolfenbüttel (67 Poet.).
115. Death and the Nun, woodcut after Hans Holbein's Images of Death (1554, first ed. 1538). © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
116. The new illustration of Death and the Abbess, woodcut from the 1870 edition published by Danz in Leipzig. © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.

Colour plates

- Pl. 1. Burial scene with a charnel house in the background, miniature at the start of the Office of the Dead with Death on a black horse charging at a Pope and an Emperor in the lower margin, book of hours produced in Paris, c.1440 (London, British Library Add. MS 18751, fol. 163r). © The British Library.
- Pl. 2a. Death and the Chess-player, wall painting by Albertus Pictor (1440-1507) in the church of Täby, Stockholm County (Sweden), 1480s. Photo: Håkan Svensson (Xauxa)
- Pl. 2b. Death and Bishop, sole extant stained-glass panel from a larger Danse Macabre window scheme, c.1500, in St Andrew's church Norwich. Photo: Mike Dixon.
- Pl. 3. The Three Living and the Three Dead, Psalter of Robert de Lisle (London, British Library, MS Arundel 83 II, fol. 127r), c.1310. © The British Library.
- Pl. 4. The Three Living and the Three Dead, in a compilation manuscript probably produced for Marie de Brabant (Paris, BnF, Bibliothèque de l' Arsenal, MS 3142, fol. 311v), c.1285. © Bibliothèque nationale de France.

- Pl. 5. Danse Macabre mural in the former Franciscan convent of Morella in the province of Castellón (Spain), c.1470. Photo: author.
- Pl. 6. The exemplum of the wicked young Emperor beholding his father's corpse, illustration in the so-called Carthusian Miscellany (London, British Library, Add. MS 37049, fol. 87r), c.1435-40. © The British Library.
- Pl. 7. Hans Baldung Grien, Death and the Maiden, drawing, 1515. © Kupferstichkabinett, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, KdZ 4578.
- Pl. 8. Simon Bening and workshop (Southern Netherlands), Raising of Lazarus, miniature at the start of the Office of the Dead in the book of hours of Joanna of Ghisteltes (Use of Messines) (London, British Library, Egerton MS 2125, fol. 64v), early sixteenth century. © The British Library.
- Pl. 9a. Encounter between death and a group of pilgrims from all walks of life, sometimes described as a 'predica della morte' (Sermon of Death) or 'predica dei morti' (Sermon of the Dead), fresco in the abbey of San Michele della Chiusa, Turin, fifteenth century. Photo: Renzo Dionigi.
- Pl. 9b. Death on a cow assaulting a woman on a lion, marginal decoration in the Amiens Missal (The Hague, Royal Library, KB MS 78 D 40, fol. 91r), 1323. © The Hague, Royal Library.
- Pl. 10. Death riding a bovine, miniature with the rubric of the Office of the Dead on a single sheet from a book of hours, French(?), early sixteenth century(?). © Graphiksammlung 'Mensch und Tod', Heinrich-Heine-University Düsseldorf.
- Pl. 11. Death on an ox attacking a young nobleman in a cemetery, opening miniature of the Office of the Dead in the De Croÿs book of Hours (Paris, Bibliothèque de l'Assemblée nationale, ms. 11, fol. 93r), late fifteenth century. © Paris, Bibliothèque de l'Assemblée nationale.
- Pl. 12. Triumph of Death, in a French translation of Petrarch's Trionfi by Simon Bourgouin (Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, ms. fr. 12423, fol. 37v), first quarter of the sixteenth century. © Bibliothèque nationale de France.
- Pl. 13. Death riding a bovine, in a cortege comprising Eaige (Age) as a man playing tambourine, Maladie (Disease) holding the banner of 'Atropos', and Accident as a man blowing a horn, illustration of Pierre Michault's La Danse aux Aveugles (Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, ms. fr. 1989, fol. 34r), late fifteenth century. © Bibliothèque nationale de France.

- Pl. 14. Vincent of Kastav, Danse Macabre fresco on the west wall of the church of St Mary, Beram (Istria), 1474. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
- Pl. 15. John of Kastav, Danse Macabre fresco in Holy Trinity church, Hrastovlje (Istria), 1490. Photo: Science and Research Centre, Koper.
- Pl. 16. Death and the King, illumination in a French luxury Danse Macabre manuscript (Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, ms fr. 995, fol. 3r), early sixteenth century. © Bibliothèque nationale de France.

PREFACE

HARTMUT FREYTAG

A book like the present volume is long overdue, for it fills a serious lacuna in this field of study. Mixed Metaphors will not only benefit researchers but also the many aficionados of the Danse Macabre. This French term that has long since become familiar in all European languages reminds us of the famous cycle that was painted in 1424-25 on the walls of one of the charnel houses in the parish cemetery of Les Saints Innocents in Paris. It is this French mural that appears to have been the origin of all later artistic examples of a medieval motif that has proved to be as inspirational as no other from this period. If I may be permitted a pun, I would say that the Danse Macabre still has not died nearly six centuries after its first appearance on the scene.

If the Danse Macabre – also known as the Dance of Death, danza de la muerte, dodendans, Totentanz, Dødedansen or Surmatants – has had such a profound impact all over Europe from its emergence in the later fourteenth century until the present day, it is because text and image meet the criteria of a mass medium and have thus had a widespread impact. The reasons for this success are manifold. The Danse Macabre is easily understood by many different audiences because it encompasses both text and image, and even when one component is lacking the other still manages to fill the gap. Furthermore, the language of the Danse Macabre is not that of literary and academic texts – viz. Latin – but that of the vernacular, which means that nobody is excluded from the lesson transmitted through its words. The Danse is of its time, yet also timeless; it is valid for today and for eternity. In the face of plague, poverty, war and suffering in the world, it picks up on the individual and collective anxieties of mankind and by representing both physical and spiritual death it raises fear – but also hope. After all, the Danse Macabre never fails to remind us of salvation through Christ and the mercy of God as our final judge. The Danse thus appeals to the desire of each individual to fulfil his duty in ordo christianus for the benefit of the Christian community during his life on earth. This duty is based on a system of values that applies to all mankind and thus transcends the social hierarchy – a system that nobody could ignore as it was in accordance with the religious beliefs of the time.

As a mass medium that was as familiar in the cities of late-medieval Europe from Paris and London to Basel and Lübeck as well as in remote areas, the Danse Macabre exhibits its migratory character. Meanwhile the Danse remains constant – but never identical – in its core message of memento mori (Remember that you must die). It changes according to location and language, it continues earlier forms of imagery and text, and soon sheds first the one and then the other medium, only to resume it later in another form. The Danse reduces and expands its repertoire of characters and contents, and in line with its adaptable character it always finds new and fascinating ways to bring across its key message. And it achieves all this omnibus locis (in all places), omnibus linguis (in all languages), and at the same time omnibus mediis (i.e. in text and image), in public as well as in private sacred and profane spaces, on a monumental scale as well as in manuscripts and in print. In its continuation of existing, and appropriation of new and newly combined forms and contents, the Danse Macabre is characterised by the principle of an adaptatio continua, the ability to change and adapt itself continuously.

It is the great merit of Mixed Metaphors that this volume addresses all the above characteristics of the Danse Macabre. As its editors, the art historians Sophie Oosterwijk and Stefanie Knöll have chosen English as today's scholarly lingua franca in order to reach the widest possible readership – rather in the spirit of the Danse itself – and moreover to inspire Anglo-American researchers who until recently showed a comparative lack of interest in the subject. An additional merit of this volume is that the contributors do not devote themselves to just one visual or textual source, or fix their attention solely on the dependence of one version on another, or confine themselves to general overviews of particular motifs. Neither do they address the tedious and unanswerable question of the etymology of the word macabre nor the problem of what came first – image or text. The present volume corresponds instead with the principle of an interdisciplinarity that transcends national boundaries. This principle is particularly appropriate not only for the subject but also for the many countries and academic disciplines brought together here. The complex title of 'Mixed Metaphors' likewise suits the Danse Macabre very well: it sums up facets of the paradoxical elements that are presented to the viewer in the chain of living and dead dancers.

In addition the title of the book outlines incongruities that are genre-specific: ambivalences, ambiguities, contrasts and contradictions that are all found in the incompatibility of transience and eternity, life and death.

The title 'Mixed Metaphors' also takes into account the principle of adaptability of the Danse, while the subtitle indicates not only the central theme but also the time frame and the geographical spread of the examples discussed in this book, viz. Europe in the Middle Ages and early modern era.

The contributions by the mostly younger and mid-career scholars in this volume who represent a multitude of languages and countries reflect how the Danse Macabre is a pan-European phenomenon that transcends linguistic and national boundaries. The multiple questions they address and their methodological starting points match the many disciplines they cover. They address specifically the Danse Macabre as well as wider issues, such as the components of dance, music and dialogue, the inversion of the natural order, violence, gender distinctions, iconographic and related aspects. Moreover, the book introduces sources that have often been neglected, such as the Istrian examples of the Danse in Slovenia, the 'Representació de la Mort' from Majorca, and a virtually unknown wall painting in a wooden church in Poland.

By addressing so many different aspects in their contributions the seventeen authors in this volume paint a diverse but also representative cycle that is symbolically reminiscent of its very subject in the number of dancers. In view of the cycle of man and death the Danse Macabre reminds both reader and viewer of the Last Judgement when God will determine eternal death and eternal life for all as He weighs justice against mercy, as symbolised by the figures 10 (justice) and 7 (mercy).

Editorial note

The editors would like to thank Sally Badham, Jon Bayliss, Mary Woodcock-Kroble, and the student-assistants at the University of Düsseldorf for their help with preparing images for this volume, and especially Tony Carr for meticulously compiling such a comprehensive index.

INTRODUCTION

SOPHIE OOSTERWIJK AND STEFANIE KNÖLL

In the beginning there was the author. All the evidence suggests that the now lost mural that was created in the cemetery of Les Saints Innocents in Paris in 1424-25 started with an image of the anonymous author who explained to the reader/viewer the nature of the work to follow: 'La dance macabre sappelle' (the Danse Macabre it is called). The Middle English poet John Lydgate went one step further in his Dance of Death by adding his own Preface to his adaptation of the French poem, referring to it as 'Macabrees daunce'.¹ Here it is the editors' task to introduce the theme.

The term 'macabre' is nowadays so familiar that it might seem to need no explanation; it is often used very loosely by the public and scholars alike without full understanding of its origins or meaning. The same applies to the Danse Macabre, a theme that most people think they know although they are likely to associate the Danse with much later interpretations of this medieval motif. There is the 1874 symphonic poem La Danse Macabre by the French composer Camille Saint-Saëns, which conjures up a vision of dancing skeletons fleeing back to their graves at the break of day, or Walt Disney's first Silly Symphony animation The Skeleton Dance of 1929, which presents a similar scene, albeit with different music. More recently still, there are the films of Tim Burton, while 'Gothic' culture has further increased interest in all things 'macabre'. Among medievalists the most familiar image may be the 'Imago Mortis' woodcut with its frolicking cadavers in Hartmann Schedel's Nuremberg Chronicle of 1493 (Fig. 1) – an image that is commonly used as an illustration in the literature on the subject. This woodcut has been deliberately chosen for the cover of this book, although it may not even be a 'true' Danse Macabre in that it does not include the living.² The fact that Saint-Saëns composed his musical interpretation nearly five hundred years after the first mention of the term underlines the enduring yet adaptable quality of the Danse.

¹ Florence Warren (ed.), with introduction and notes by Beatrice White, The Dance of Death, edited from MSS. Ellesmere 26/A.13 and B.M. Lansdowne 699, collated with the other extant MSS., EETS, o.s. 181 (London, 1931, repr. Woodbridge, 2000), l. 24. The French quotations are from Guy Marchant's 1485 edition.

² See the essay by Sophie Oosterwijk in this volume.

From relative neglect – at least by anglophone scholars – the Danse Macabre is rapidly becoming a fashionable topic of research among scholars from different disciplines. However, it is precisely because of the many transformations over time that the original meaning and reception of the theme in its different manifestations are often misunderstood. Too narrow an approach – be it historical, art-historical or literary – is likely to result in an incomplete or biased view, quite apart from the fact that one also ought to consider examples of the Danse not just in isolation but in both a wider and an international context. Yet the literature has grown so vast that such an approach would now be not just ambitious but almost foolhardy, especially as the bulk of studies on the subject is written in languages other than English.³

It was especially the problem of language and inaccessibility that called for a new study in English with essays by international experts in this field. This book not only offers examples of the latest research, but also brings together a variety of approaches to different aspects of the Danse Macabre itself and its many parallels. For there were other forms of the ‘macabre’ in medieval culture that influenced the genesis and character of the Danse or were inspired by it in turn. As the authors in this volume demonstrate, there are many comparisons and cross-references between the Danse and the Legend of the Three Living and the Three Dead, tomb iconography, the imagery in the Office of the Dead in books of hours, and the presentation of death or Death personified in other contexts.

Part of the problem when studying the Danse Macabre is the fact that it is hard to define because it is so many things: a literary text as well as a visual motif – sometimes in combination, but not always – with moreover performative potential, even if it has never been proved conclusively that the theme originated in some type of performance. There is also the possibility of folklore influence about revenants haunting the living, although this likewise remains supposition.⁴ A broad contextual approach is needed for a proper understanding of the Danse. All too often, the focus among historians is on its memento mori message, to the exclusion of its satirical character that literary scholars have long been aware of. Interpreting the Danse as a religious theme – or as ‘church art’⁵ – can result in a supposed ‘discovery’ of its profane character and create a false paradox.

³ James Clark’s 1950 monograph The Dance of Death in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance may be flawed and outdated in many respects, but few would dare attempt a similarly succinct new study of the Danse across Europe.

⁴ Nancy Caciola, ‘Wraiths, Revenants and Ritual in Medieval Culture’, Past and Present, 152 (1996), 3-45, esp. 40-44.

Any attempt to distinguish between religious and secular is fraught with danger as medieval morality happily combined both aspects. Even the underlying Christian way of thinking or the occurrence of church representatives in the Danse do not make it a religious theme. After all, Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales can hardly be termed a religious poem despite its pilgrimage motif and the inclusion of a monk, a priest, a pardoner, a friar, a nun and prioress – in fact, far from it! Likewise, the church setting in which the Danse frequently occurred needs to be understood properly: there is a vast difference between the more public religious spaces, such as the nave or the cemetery, and the liturgical enclosure of the choir, even though profane imagery can often be found in the choir stalls. Cemeteries likewise had a more public character. The Dutch historian Johan Huizinga painted a vivid – if not wholly accurate – picture of the cemetery of Les Innocents in Paris where the painted Danse acted as a backdrop to scenes of trade and prostitution as well as to sermons, processions and festivities.⁶ Miniatures of burial scenes in late-medieval books of hours frequently depict similar charnel houses with visible piles of skulls and bones in their roof spaces (Pl. 1), thereby illustrating how contemporaries were confronted almost daily with the prospect of their own mortality and the inevitable decomposition of their remains: sic transit gloria. In real life these stark reminders must have been even more poignant – and pungent – than any painting or poem, but they only encouraged artists and authors to conjure up ever more horrifying spectres of death and decay.

It is in some ways futile to debate whether the Danse began as a text or as an image, a superstition, a rite or enactment, when in the course of its long recorded history from the fourteenth century to the present day it diversified yet further. It is this diversity that the present volume aims to highlight – the mixing of motifs and metaphors that characterise the Danse itself and ‘the macabre’ at large, both in the medieval period and beyond.

The volume has been divided into five sections but the essays contain many cross-references that are intended to draw attention to parallels and comparisons elsewhere. The first section on Duality and Allegory addresses questions about the nature of the dead protagonists in the Danse

⁵ Cf. Rolf Paul Dreier, Der Totentanz – ein Motiv der kirchlichen Kunst als Projektionsfläche für profane Botschaften (1425-1650), PhD thesis (Rotterdam: Erasmus University/Leiden: Brill, 2010).

⁶ Johan Huizinga, ‘The Vision of Death’: chapter 11 in The Autumn of the Middle Ages, transl. Rodney J. Payton and Ulrich Mammitzsch (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996), 170.

Macabre – whether Death personified or the dead as mirror images of the living. In some cases, as Sophie Oosterwijk suggests, the question of identity must be taken even further when real-life portraits are integrated into the Danse and supposedly stereotypical protagonists are presented instead as historical figures, thereby strengthening the vanitas warning. Mirroring is also evident in the postures and movements of the dead dancers, especially in the woodcuts in the earliest French printed edition of 1485 by Guy Marchant, as discussed by Frances Eustace in her essay written in collaboration with Pamela King. Dance and the musical aspects of the Danse are addressed by Susanne Warda. Referring mainly to the German tradition, she stresses the aggressive and chaotic tones, as well as the reversal of the natural order displayed in the Danse. Maike Christadler explores the erotic potential of the Danse in the early modern period, especially in relation to the allegorical meaning of the female body.

The focus of the second section is on Macabre Parallels with first of all the Three Living and the Three Dead, which was a widespread motif across medieval Europe from the later thirteenth century onwards. The juxtaposition of the two groups of living and dead figures has obvious parallels with the Danse, although this does not mean that the older theme directly inspired the latter. Christine Kralik's essay takes the depiction of this moralising tale in medieval manuscript illumination as its starting point to discuss the elements of dialogue and violence that are also important elements in the Danse, while Marco Piccat discusses the iconographic variations of the same motif and related imagery (Pl. 9a) in mural paintings in medieval Italy. A very different motif is analysed by Sylvie Bethmont-Gallerand, viz. Death riding a bovine mount instead of the more traditional horse. The author traces this enigmatic iconography from its earliest known occurrence in the margins of a French missal of 1325 to much later interpretations and variations in literature and art.

Death in all its forms was furthermore an inspiration to authors and playwrights in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Kenneth Rooney examines the role of the dead in two Middle English romances, their nature, and their impact on the living protagonists. Lenke Kovács deals with the performative aspects of the motif in Spanish examples. While the Spanish Dança general de la Muerte may be the oldest extant text of the Danse – older by perhaps thirty years than the French poem we know from the mural in Paris – the focus of her essay is on a sixteenth-century dramatic adaptation from Majorca. In this play Death summons a range of social representatives, each displaying a different reaction to Death. A special relationship to Death is discussed by Jean Wilson. She deals with the explicit eroticism that can be found in early modern English literature, drama, and in tomb iconography, where sex and violence are closely associated. Death is often presented as a lover, and metaphors of flowers, marriage and death are mixed as in the words of Paris in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet as he scatters flowers on the tomb of his seemingly dead bride Juliet: 'Sweet flower, with flowers the bridal bed I strew'.

The fourth section focusses on spatial contexts, first of all on choir stalls where profane imagery can be found alongside carvings of a more serious, death-related nature, as discussed by Kristiane Lemé-Hébuterne. The mixing of metaphors is also evident in the two medieval Istrian frescoes examined by Tomislav Vignjević. Here the Danse Macabre is juxtaposed with the Wheel of Fortune and the Tree of Knowledge with Adam and Eve – the Fall of Man that brought sin and death to mankind. The latter subject was found in combination with the theme of the old man and Death in a virtually unknown mural that Jutta Schuchard encountered in the wooden church at Bierdzany-Bierdzańska Śmierć in Silesia (Poland), dating to the early eighteenth century.

The art of printing played a crucial role in the later dissemination of the Danse, culminating in the famous Images of Death woodcut series by Hans Holbein the Younger, first published in 1538. Caroline Zöhl examines the unusual picture cycle of eleven engravings that accompanies the Office of the Dead in a book of hours printed in Paris in 1509 and includes the Tale of the Three Living and the Three Dead alongside images of the Expulsion, Souls in Purgatory, a deathbed scene, Job on the dung heap, and the Three Enemies of Man. The last two contributions deal with the reception of Hans Holbein's macabre series of prints. The focus of Winfried Schwab's essay is Holbein's Danse Macabre alphabet and variations on these fascinating initials by followers of the artist. Stefanie Knöll re-examines the importance of Huldreich Fröhlich's Danse Macabre editions, which mix motifs from Holbein's Images of Death with elements from the Basel Danse.

The use of metaphors was very fashionable in the late medieval and early modern period. Lydgate often combined several in one sentence, as in his description of how 'cruel dethe that ben so wyse and sage' slays his victims 'by stroke of pestilence' (ll. 6-7). Throughout this volume a yet wider variety of images and metaphors appear: dance, music, violence, inversion, sin, sex, the Fall, the Wheel of Fortune, the Three Living and the Three Dead. All these fascinating variations allowed authors and artists to remind their contemporaries of the ultimate truth: everything must pass and all men must die. For this is how the author in Marchant's final Danse Macabre woodcut (Fig. 14) sums it up with yet another metaphor, 'Cest tout vent: chose transitoire' (All is but wind, something transient).

